There is no time for hapless, weary Brazilians to catch their breath. The first and second time, they just burst through the line. The third time, the ball comes to them, and it's a penalty. There's no explanation for the goal. They just score again. Brazil went ahead with a goal from Thiago Silva late in the first half, and after the final whistle, they went for the necktie. It was time to celebrate and win, to put on the finishing touches, to cry tears of joy and delight and make of this match what they wanted it to be from the beginning, to make of it a kind of moral victory. But Brazil wasn't smiling at the final whistle. It was quiet, and the atmosphere grew heavier with every second. Everyone was a little more tense. They had already collected their points, and their problems with fair play, and their flaws as a footballing nation, but now the game was over and the pressure was on for the inevitable.
